Block trackers in installed browsers Clear browser data Automatically apply the policies for all the installed browsers Additional configuration parameters Version: Latest I love the simplicity of the environment. It looks great and the absolute best feature of all is that it's a web application I can host on my own web server. It's simply amazing how easy it is to create an entire environment on my own web server without the need to be a web hosting provider. The only downside is that the initial process to create the environment on my own server does take a little bit of time, but once the server is created the up time is exceptionally high and never goes down for me. Overall, this is an easy and simple web application that I definitely recommend to anyone looking to create their very own web environment in less than an hour. And for those who think that it's a little complex to get started, I can say that I take it very seriously and that's why I've created a step by step tutorial to help those out there that are new to creating their own environment. Remora is a web application that creates a virtual machine with the Linux operating system. It aims to be an open source Linux system. The web application is extremely simple and intuitive. The interface is very clean and there are very few buttons. As with most web applications, the bigger the environment you create, the more RAM and CPU power you'll need. The biggest downside however is that it's not a web hosting application, and as such, there's no support for creating an environment over a web server. The application does, however, provide a simple and quick way to start creating your own Linux system and exploring a world of choice. You can build a system of your own, but there's no guarantee that it'll be supported. If you need a simple and easy to use web application, look no further than Remora. It's a great solution for those who want to create their very own Linux environment on their personal server.
