Load or create new playlists. Mutation in the fatty acid synthase gene results in mental retardation and adrenal hypoplasia. A clinical syndrome of dwarfism, mental retardation, and adrenal hypoplasia was identified in five members of a kindred in the United States. All affected children were moderately to severely mentally retarded, with one suffering from profound global developmental delay. Three siblings had persistent infections, and one patient died at 3 years of age after being severely compromised by Pseudomonas aeruginosa. The mutation responsible for the syndrome was determined by linkage analysis and was a missense mutation in the first coding exon of the human fatty acid synthase gene (FASN). The affected alleles were shown to contain a G-->A transition in the second nucleotide of the codon for alanine 308. This transition alters the encoded amino acid from alanine to valine. When the mutation was sequenced in a panel of normal individuals, including additional members of the kindred, the same mutation was observed in a single individual as the only sequence variant. The mutation was shown to be absent from the databases of the National Center for Biotechnology Information and the European Bioinformatics Institute. The clinical and molecular genetic data support a diagnosis of familial partial lipodystrophy with adrenal hypoplasia.
