Clean interface with customization options If you're running Windows 7 then the installation process goes smoothly, and you'll probably only encounter a prompt that asks to deploy.NET Framework as well, because it's required for the browser to work. However, you can't do this normally in Windows 8, but only if you enable compatibility with Windows 7. Once deployed on your system, it's time to see whether or not it can satisfy your daily need for Internet. In terms of design, it comes with it's own stylish interface, with time always displayed in the title bar, a decent amount of interface themes,a few different tab styles to choose from, and color options for text. Needs more work on functionality The upper toolbar is fitted with everything a self-respecting web browser needs, and that is a navigation bar and buttons, tab support, built-in search bar with an impressive collection of engines. The rest of the space is used to show the pages you go on. Locations you visit the most can be saved in a favorites manager, simply by pressing the Star button. Moreover, navigation history can easily be accessed and managed, cookies enabled and cleaned, set as default browser, and more. Everything seems to be in its favor, with visuals that don't disappoint, and set of features that lives up to most types of online tasks. However, functionality is the one dragging down overall practicality. There's a high
