

A: I have used this adapter before. I just tried it out again - works fine. Post navigation The Self-Reliance Project at WSU From a video recording of "Taking my place in the Sun." I knew we had found the venue for the Self-Reliance Project. There were plenty of flowering Japanese maple trees, and old, old oak trees. I was overwhelmed at all the interesting flowering shrubs I saw, and by how many trees! I did not take as many pictures as I should have, but I will try to remember to photograph more in the future. There were many interesting shapes and sizes of flowers that I could not fit into the frame of my camera. To get to the site, we drove over a new, well-engineered dirt road that connected to a broad, paved road that ran by Route 9, where we then headed to the Willow Grove parking lot, a good two-hour trip from our home. Once we had parked in Willow Grove, we hoofed it over to the garden site. We arrived just as the sun was going down, and when we left, the sun was beginning to rise. This was the first time I had been at the site, but I could visualize the planned layout of the gardens. I was taken back to a time when I used to sit in my backyard, admiring the plants in the flower garden and the large trees around me. From the many women who have worked and are still working to make a place of beauty at this site, I know it will be a success. The growing season is still somewhat short in the Pacific Northwest, but there are many avenues of propagation that can be tried, and a few useful plants can still be produced. I have come across a couple of people who actually use the garden solely for propagation. I am not as brave as these people are, and I have a much more established garden with many more plants and some more interesting plants than I would want to experiment with. One of the first things that caught my eye was a group of five flowering hornbeams, some of which were flowering in the US National Park Service Orchid Garden. The orchid foundation had recently given the plants the distinction of being their Orchid of the Week. I was very impressed with this information, as this kind of news was not something I had been informed of before. I would not have known if I had not noticed the special notice in 82138339de
