> Keymacro is an open source iPhone app which help you to select key from the terminal, then you can type a sentence, make a call or send a message for free. It only cost US$0.99. Google's Chrome browser is used by almost all users out there. In recent years, the browser has had some security issues, though, that's not the only thing that Google did right. Another thing Google made was a browser that took care of crashes with a subtle background notification. Downloading the latest browser update is what Chrome does every time it gets its next security update. The update only takes a couple of minutes and during the time you're downloading Chrome is as stable as you can get it. The Update Allowing webpages to run any code that you see will make webpages much more vulnerable, which is why Google put such a strong effort into this process. Since Chrome does not use a sandbox, any code that runs will run without any restrictions. These include code from any website, not only malicious ones. With the increased capability comes an increase in the chances for users to be attacked by malware. Since Chrome does not place any restrictions on any of the code that runs, and since the browser does not run in a sandbox, the malicious code can execute on your device as if it was a native app. The Code Instead of getting a new beta version of Chrome, all they did was release a new revision of the code that the browser runs on. This version is the stable version of the browser and is referred to as Chrome 75. Once the stable update was released, it was only a matter of time before the malicious software makers came up with a suitable exploit and started abusing it. Google closed the new bug within hours and deployed a fix in their nightly builds. The bug is in a built-in shared library for Chrome, that is supposed to handle screen unlocks. When the malicious code tried to open the screen unlock mechanism, it found a way to get around the security checks of the library, and used that to make it open up a full-screen app. Google's Response After it received a report about the 77a5ca646e
