Saeed Nasir Textbook of Economics, Ilmi Kutab Khana, Lahore. 8. . . 8. Introduction To Business by M. Saeed Nasir Proliferative changes in adult human retinal pigment epithelium during aging and in association with choroidal neovascularization. As a model for age-related changes in retinal pigment epithelium (RPE), the proliferative ability of the normal adult human RPE was assessed by measuring cell cycle kinetics in vitreous and ciliary body cells of the anterior chamber angle. The measurements were done in three different areas (superficial, middle, and deep) of the retina and compared with age-matched ciliary body-choroid and iris-ciliary body. The mean cell cycle times were 2.1-3.0 times longer in RPE than in ciliary body-choroid or iris-ciliary body. The mean age of the RPE was 84.3 +/- 6.4 years. The rate of RPE proliferation increased with increasing age, so that it was 2.7 times higher in the ciliary body-choroid complex of the 70- to 79-year-old group than in the same cells from a 56- to 65-year-old group. Cell proliferation increased 3.6 times in the RPE of a 76- to 85-year-old group compared with the 56- to 65-year-old group. Proliferation was much less in the iris-ciliary body of a 60- to 79-year-old group. Although proliferation increased with age, it was lowest in cells from the RPE of a 76- to 85-year-old group and highest in cells from the iris-ciliary body of the same age group. In eyes with choroidal neovascularization, the proliferative response of the RPE was greatest and occurred in the deep (superficial) part of the retina. There were differences between eyes with choroidal neovascularization and nonneovascular age-related macular degeneration. Q: Node.js + mysql - how to turn off logging?
