That is the case for freelance illustrator Emily Fischer. A few years ago, she started getting rejected by traditional publishers over and over again. “It happened with the first book that I ever submitted,” Fischer says. “I was working on pictures of Elsie the elephant (pictured above). I sent it off to an editor and then it was rejected. I was like, ‘Okay, this one is kind of a sign that this is not for me.’” Fischer pivoted to illustration for children’s books, and now her work is published in countries like Japan and France. Her work is even in the Smithsonian Archives! She even ran her own Kickstarter campaign to fund book printing for more of her work. As you might imagine, Fischer is still getting rejected. But it’s a good reminder to not only aim for publication, but to learn what you’re good at. “It helps you figure out who you are in the business and who you would like to be,” Fischer says. “So that book is a little bit like a hobby. I love doing children’s books, but if I was a careers person and was like ‘Hey, I want to do kids books and I love to draw.’ that might be my strong suit. “If you look at Pinterest, you see a sea of bored people wanting to be creative. There are all these people who come in and out of the creative space. You never know what you might do creatively. You just have to do it and see what happens.” Fischer’s advice for people interested in art or entrepreneurship? “ 55cdcd1cd
