The presence of metastatic cervical nodes in oral cavity cancers was evaluated in a retrospective study (using the histological report and the operative report) and correlated to the patient's survival. The influence of other clinical and histological features such as age, sex, tumor size, differentiated grade and staging, was also analyzed. 99 lesions in 97 patients with oral cancer were evaluated. The presence of metastatic nodes was revealed in 37 (3.9%) patients and the correlation with prognosis was statistically significant. Primary node status and the stage at initial diagnosis had the greatest influence in survival. Age had no influence on prognosis. Monthly Archives: March 2014 Like many other environmental organization, the Research Center on Environment and Health (RCA) shares serious concerns about the implications of the proposed Permian Basin Study for the Great Plains Environmental Law Center, Inc. (GLELC). In fact, it is a priority for the RCA to promote the adoption of an approach that achieves a strong protection of the natural environment, public health and the health of the workers. With this in mind, the RCA intends to launch a broad debate with other organizations (including in the Great Plains, particularly GLELC) on the best strategy to prevent the Permian Basin Study from being finalized and implemented. As such, a "mockup" meeting will be held to work out the modalities of such a debate, including a possible joint declaration, in order to generate different perspectives on this issue. We have to remind you that the Permian Basin Study is not part of the Environmental Protection Agency's (EPA) so-called "safety review", but a "strategic environmental assessment", which has no legal purpose other than to set the planning stage for the oil and gas extraction. In other words, the EPA has not yet conducted the preliminary risk analysis, while it is perfectly acceptable for state agencies (under Federalism) to conduct such analysis. In an article that has already been published, you can read a complete response to the Permian Basin Study.
