What's new:

Will Murder You Shawn Ashmore plays Finn, a charming psychopath who has a little gift for bedside manner. And when it comes to hyper-hip, over-the-top comedy films, what's better than a thriller about a charming psychopath with a witty canard? (Sorry, nothing.) Such is A&E's commitment to creating truly jaw-dropping entertainment by cramming actual story content inside of the bodies of never-heard-from, seemingly non-actors. So not only do we get Christopher Meloni's pandering performance as a reformed drug addict and the truly repugnant character played by Vince Vaughn, we also get Bruce Willis, Emma Thompson, and Tim Robbins, et al. Ha! Sure, some of these performances are laughable, but usually their casting choice (or, in the case of Vaughn, multiple choices) is forgivable. Granted, sometimes that choice points to a film being produced by a big studio with a big budget. But A&E's commitment to proper casting often seems curiously absent and selective in Mad Age & This Guy Will Murder You. Lauded by some critics as the gold standard in dramatic comedy, I would struggle to argue that anything in this film has won award after award. But in watching the movie, that's not necessarily what matters most. Its focus is more on its manic and back-and-forth, at times halting, pacing. Page after page of dialogue, while not typically a strong suit for me, would seem to function as a sort of happy medium between the comedic and the rest of the movie. While the over-the-top and self-parodic nature of this film isn't new, what makes this particularly unique is that, from the get-go, it's clear that these characters—warm hearted primary school teacher and sappy looking teens—aren't acting at all. Sadly, only about six minutes of this film is actually set at the primary school we are led to believe is the main setting. Despite the title, there are only sporadic death/murder scenes. Most of the murder/death in this movie actually takes place at home in the home's garishly colored kitchen. During a scene in which Finn (Shawn Ashmore) and his wife Barbara (Zooey Deschanel) are having some marital problems, Finn gets imp
