If you manage to get giganormous, crushing, really big hits, it gets pretty crowded. When I started playing, I had a tamed Colossus as well, and my party always managed to outrun, out-magic, or out-fight his monsters, so there were a lot of dead monsters where I would walk away unscathed. Either I was really good at keeping him from running away, managing to kill him before that, or my tamed giant just killed him quickly enough that I had time to walk away. It took a while for me to get my dead monster code perfected, and I haven't really played solo anymore since then, except in this random battle recorder thing where i have to fight a randomized number of monsters and bosses before my life respawns. I remember back in the day when I was playing Fallout 2 on the SNES. One had a giant dragon in it (known as "Breath of the Dragon" in the US versions of the game). At the time, at the spawn screen, you could choose either questy thing or domination thing (or dragon thing). In dragon thing, you were supposed to travel onto a ship and then fight the boss. It would make 3 turns and then you'd fight the boss. Then he'd regenerate a bit, and your guy would have to keep fighting, etc. If you chose "questy thing," then you'd fight the boss then you'd have to do this thing over and over again, and finally the boss would die. Since Fallout 2 was so famous, it was really easy to get the domination thing, despite the reputation of the dragon questy thing. Anyway, it was a quality game. A lot of hours of fun. I never did complete it in one sitting, though. I still haven't picked it up since its 20th anniverary. Time passes, people move on, etc. This is the 80s, and I know my division will be up next week. I'm mourning my 23 and 24 year olds, and telling myself I'll be glad I didn't get promoted on the end of the division when
