Expression of components of the alloantigen-specific CD8 T cell immune response in mouse skin. The composition of the immune system at the tissue level, which is somewhat similar to that found at the cell level, determines the route of T cell migration during immune responses. In this study, we analyzed the distribution of components of the CD8 T cell-mediated immune response in mouse skin using nonpolymorphic CD8 TCR transgenic mice transgenic for the TCR-alpha, -beta heterodimers derived from an OVA-specific CD8 T cell clone. We find CD8 T cells displaying diverse functions such as preferentially cytotoxic T lymphocyte activity or recruiting effector cells in the local skin microenvironment, at naive and after antigenic stimulation. An analysis of the migration of these cells in normal skin using recombinant IFN-gamma and TNFR-Ig fusion proteins provides evidence of their epidermal localization in vivo. These results demonstrate a dissimilar IFN-gamma signature in two skin populations expressing distinct levels of IFN-gamma and TNFR-1. While the CD4+ T cell response is qualitatively similar in epidermis and dermis, CD8+ T cells display a bimodal distribution. This is accompanied by bimodal expression of the chemokine receptors/ligands CXCR3 and CCR5 in epidermis. CD8+ T cells respond differently to skin antigenic challenge and have been shown to play an important role in the resolution of tissue-specific inflammation. We propose that selected environmental cues present in or induced on the skin during contact sensitization or vaccination, such as antigen, irritant, infectious agent, are able to influence the outcome of the immune response in selected anatomic sites.
