Many studies have shown the association between medication adherence and overall health. However, the impact of medication adherence on symptom control in patients with prostate cancer (CaP) undergoing radiation therapy (RT) is unclear. Therefore, we aimed to evaluate the association between medication adherence and RT-related symptoms using the Medication Adherence Report Scale (MARS)-8 in patients with CaP undergoing RT. A prospective pilot study of patients with CaP undergoing radical RT. Self-administered MARS-8 at baseline (prior to RT) and at 6-month follow-up. A total of 40 patients completed the study. On univariate analysis, satisfaction with medical care was significantly associated with medication adherence ($P = 0.006$), whereas satisfaction with RT was not. The mean MARS-8 score at 6-month follow-up was significantly higher than that at baseline (29.1 vs. 23.6, $P = 0.002$). The mean total score at baseline and at 6-month follow-up was similar (29.1 and 30.3, respectively, $P = 0.130$). The percentage of patients with improved symptoms at 6-month follow-up was significantly higher than that at baseline (73% vs. 40%, $P = 0.026$). On multivariate analysis, improvement in RT-related symptoms at 6-
