You want to share videos on your site or send content to the past.. The online video has recently found more and more popularity in the process of generating ideas for events, advertising and marketing, media distribution, and also as a tool for convenience. Watch this video: Review :The Environmental Protection Agency has proposed to reduce the maximum allowed level of a toxic lead additive to unleaded gasoline from 1.005 percent to 0.005 percent.

The arsenic part of that additive is already federally regulated at 0.025 percent. The new proposal from the EPA means that people who drive regular unleaded would see their emissions drop by more than 6 percent, despite the fact that they would be exposing themselves to a carcinogen that is thousands of times more toxic than carbon monoxide. "This regulation would take us backwards and lead to more deaths," said Sen. John Barrasso, the Republican who is chairman of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee. Americans are dying in small numbers. Since 2012, more than 18,000 Americans have died as a result of poisoning from lead-contaminated gasoline. But the impact of this regulation is largely symbolic, as the maximum allowable level of lead in gasoline is currently set to the same level as it was in 1975, when new powertrain standards were created for automotive pollution control. The new lead ban on gas would thus not affect the emissions of vehicles, but instead could affect auto catalytic converters, which are part of vehicles emissions control systems. “As a senior member of the EPA committee, I understand that EPA needs to take some actions related to rules requiring the use of new catalytic converters on cars and trucks,” said Ron Batory, who was acting EPA administrator under President George W. Bush. “But the agency must also remain on the right side of science.” Many auto makers have not taken the new standards into account, and they continue to mount strong opposition to the required conversion for gasoline. When the new powertrain standards were created in the '70s, Congress made the intelligent move of protecting human health as a consideration of the nation's environmental protection policies. But the EPA has for decades failed to balance safety with the environment, and the result is that lead is allowed to wind up in gasoline at a level that is 1,000 times that which was set to protect people from atmospheric pollution in the 1960s.
