Previous work from this laboratory had determined that 15 to 60 mg of a water soluble drug could be coated onto 5 mg of poly-D,L-lactic acid (PLA) to make a microparticle that retained its efficacy. Because the product is not protected against pH and enzymatic attack in the gut, such particles may degrade in the gut and allow the drug to be released. In the current project, we are investigating the feasibility of coatings the product with sugars that would remain effective despite the effects of the gastrointestinal tract. We will initially test the feasibility of coating the drug with lactose. Then, we will add lactose to the PLA prior to coating the drug and test whether the added sugar resists degradation in the pH and enzymatic environment of the stomach. Microparticles prepared with lactose will also be tested for their effectiveness in delivering the drug in the stomach and upper intestinal tract of rats. To confirm the effectiveness of the product, we will investigate the utility of biodegradable microparticles for targeted drug delivery. This research will yield data that will help formulate the next generation of controlled delivery systems that remain effective and do not cause intestinal obstruction.North Korea at the 2017 Summer Universiade North Korea competed at the 2017 Summer Universiade in Taipei, Taiwan from 6 to 17 August.
