Commercial VFX houses and entertainment studios are using it to create new content for television and film. The product also supports consumer-level uses such as individuals and consumer- oriented end-use apps for such things as live action games, virtual reality and other non-pro applications. Ipi Motion Capture can be used to capture any of a number of activities, such as: Running - The user can run against a virtual wall or flat surface, while simultaneously recording video of the movement. Lifting & Dragging - The user can lift an object and/or drag it around the environment. The movements are captured via a motion capture system and the motion is then applied to a 3D model. Jump & Throw - The user can jump or throw an object and/or use a motion capture system to capture that motion. This can be used for training or creating new content for games, simulators and other non-pro applications. iPi Motion Capture can be operated with either a multisensor or a single sensor system and works with a variety of hardware configurations. As an example, the field of view of the motion capture camera is such that one user can run the full length of a set while others can be recording at different angles. iPi Motion Capture supports a large number of real-time and offline applications for a variety of platforms.
