What's new:

of S, G, K, and M Stars in 7 Planet Systems Brown Dwarfs Large Planets On October 26, 2011, the extraordinary Planet Nine was first hypothesized, by co-author William Grundy of the Minor Planet Center. His motivation was to improve our understanding of the orbits of the small but surprising collection of planets that seem to be trapped in empty zones surrounding the orbits of the Sun and Neptune. For many years a small, densely packed population of planets dominated the most promising regions of the sky known as the "Goldilocks zones" of their solar systems. Planets within these zones experience habitable temperatures and a liquid surface from the star. Planets in the nearby Antarctic Circle were observed until recently by the Very Large Array radio telescope in New Mexico. Observations have continued in a new expanded instrument. Globally, the observed Solar System planets range in size from Mercury to Ceres, with more than 700 million rocky planets known to inhabit the solar system. Others include a number of larger bodies such as Jupiter and Saturn and smaller ones such as Earth, Venus, Mars, Uranus and Neptune. Planets are supported by gravitational forces on both large and small scales from the Sun. Earth is supported by gravity from both large and small solar masses. Gravity pulls each planet constantly on their orbit of the Sun and the other planets. The gravitational pull of planets on each other is known as perturbations. If a planet is too close to its neighbor, the larger body will experience tidal gravity that raises tides on the smaller body. By "the Greek philosopher" Plato, we know the Sun is this center of all planetary bodies. However, today's discovery and understanding of planetary motions allows us to better define the shape of the solar system. The simulations of the orbits of the planets indicate that 4-5 rocky planets orbit the Sun with perihelion distances of approximately 32-40 AU, just beyond Earth's orbit. These planets can be termed the "inner planets". When a hypothetical Planet Nine is in the vicinity, the inner planets swing through this region, while the outer planets move on a different orbit. At greater distances, small planets will often not orbit the Sun, but interact with Jupiter. A second large, diverse population of smaller planets will then be orbiting Jupiter like the asteroids or the Kuiper belt. Outer planets such as Uranus and Neptune, define these regions. When orbits are close to that of any of these planets, they will be dominated by perturbations with the perturbing planets
