Q: How to produce an equivalent of `Project Gutenberg` for music? I was flipping through G+ the other day, and was delighted to come across this site, which is currently hosting a large collection of music. I have seen similar sites in the past, but I don't know how to get music like this from my own collection, or to produce such a site myself. Is there an existing site that you can recommend that I might be able to use as a starting point? A: There are some online music collections like that, like the free ones at Android Music, and eMusic (paid). And of course there are the downloadable collections, like the work of the music-equivalent of Project Gutenberg. Greetings, Brawlers! The time has come for the yearly roll out of RNG has been and gone. Any time frame you place upon yourself for finishing a challenge will be met with a very real and possibly brutal response if you are not successful. If you can't be bothered with the challenge, you should at least be aware that you are being watched, so don't be too disappointed when you get the axe. Should you be so lucky as to have your challenge completed, congratulations are in order, however if you are struggling, it is possible to reclaim the dice. Please refer to the page for help and tips on how to reclaim the dice if needed. If you are having issues with the special abi in dungeons or the old map, refer to the page for help on how to get around these, otherwise there really isn't much else to say other than a couple of quick bits. Good luck and have fun! Threads of Time You are all welcome to share your stories about past roll outs here! The number of monthly users surpasses 2 million and is growing rapidly. That has fueled Kambria's record-setting growth, from 1,000 users last year to 2.1 million today. Founder Michael Shi built the early versions of a mobile app, a web-based service and a central bank with the Kambria system. They now account for 3.5 million of the total Kambria's user base. HNx 09/02: Steve Jobs Resigns from Apple - dangrossman ===== staunch I'm a bit surprised by this. Jobs didn't really have a proven track record of (unfair) ruthless ability to destroy products. I'm sure if he ever tried that with an existing product, it would be pretty easy to replicate. This probably means that Apple has a very different management team on tap for the future. ~~~ mechanical_fish _I'm a bit surprised by this_ That would be a bit surprising to me, too. Steve Jobs is a remarkable executive: He doesn't just make cool products -- he makes cool _companies_. He started the trend of consumer electronics companies hiring an army of manufacturing engineers and roboticists to shore up the supply chain. He architected the modular, always-up-to-date-design of Apple's computers. He created the iPhone and iPod. He wowed a gaggle of Apple shareholders with notes, and created whole new industries around things like "portable architecture". He was pretty much the only guy who could convince people to spend a few thousand dollars to buy a new machine every couple of years, and he got that thing redesigned before the actual owners even knew it existed. His destruction of products? I'll save that one for another article. But if anything, he destroyed more things than most -- the "good enough" standard that he fixed, a culture of magic and excess that he homogenized, the competition from Apple the BeOS clone and Microsoft the clone of Apple, the lawsuit that he led that bankrupted Netscape, the exploitative web hosting business models that he helped destroy, and so on. ----- tallanvor I don't think this means Apple will become a non-ideal business, but I think it means the product leadership is going to change. I'm not saying that the designers won't design great products, but Apple needs a guy with a really healthy ego like Jobs, and it won't be Steve anymore. I don't see how anyone would disagree that the design will be different. ----- seldo
