Damon Lindelof's The Dharma Initiative is a show heavily inspired by Twin Peaks, with a few throwbacks to Lost. What Lost nerds will love, however, is a undercurrent running the length of the show, that is, science fiction. And in this issue, it resurfaces. 1 In nuclear research circles there is a man known as Paper Tiger. He, like David, lets himself be controlled at will by other people to create that distance they crave from their lives. Paper Tiger doesn't just power his research with his own excitement at guessing what the government really wants. He has redefined himself, becoming the government's best weapon in its covert battles with its enemies. If David Palmer, the man who accidentally began the chain of events that brought about the mysterious electromagnetic fluctuations at the site of the 1918 San Francisco earthquake, was a comet crashing into the Earth, Paper Tiger is the asteroid that caused it. 2 This is a horror story. This is post-apocalyptic science fiction with a surprising moral ending. This is a story about survivors, a novel which cares little for your comfort but in the end ends on the high note of renewal. Preferably not in the same year. 3 Why then do I see people who love the show leave before they read the comics? I don't know. If you read nearly everything you love, after a while you start to think, "Hey, that is not my kind of story". Well I for one don't think that's true. I do think there is something about seeing how a show comes together; kind of seeing how the sausage is made. It can be amazing in the construction of a story. And if we need something mythological, like the ghost girl in Twin Peaks, I suppose that's what TV is. It's about trading reality for imagination. 4 Damon Lindelof (formerly of Lost) has not produced a bad comic. It is a well-planned, entertaining trip through an episodic television show. I do however, have trouble
