LG's midrange G5 looks to be the company's next big contender at the top of the Android hardware pile, but it will certainly take a lot more than another handset. It is, of course, a lot more than just another handset. But it's also something that's a lot more than what the G5 offers you. What this product is, exactly, is going to be revealed gradually in the coming weeks, but this week the Korea Herald has touched base with the manufacturer, LG, to ask some salient questions about the G5. Firstly, what kind of device is the G5?

The G5 will be the first Android handset that LG has developed internally. This means that — in theory — the development team is free to make whatever changes they feel are necessary, with the target-market having no say in what is created. So don't expect the same high-end build quality as, say, Samsung's Galaxy S7, but we would expect the G5 to be up there for others. What will it be like to hold in your hand? LG says that the G5 will feature a large, curved 5.3-inch display with a narrow bezel, which it defines as "a way to express its premium design." That's not surprising. A curved display is going to be a lot of fun to use in terms of fit-and-finish. That display will also sport Gorilla Glass 4, so the chassis is going to be plenty tough — not some flimsy plastic injection moulding. Is the display going to be AMOLED? You Refog Employee Monitor review: It's been said that it will simply cost less to have the monitoring done and stay away from a life of crime than the fine and jail time. This is true. But in reality, the person who is tasked to monitor your workplace surveillance system is less likely to be able to detect illegal and likely unsafe activity at your workplace. We have tested this program in different US and European cities such as Los Angeles, UK, San Francisco, New York, Amsterdam and Frankfurt. By allowing employees to add and remove custom employee monitors from the software, it means that the full system still works even when employees move. And if this is not enough for you, let alone the fact that the software is easy to setup and install, then we have also launched a remote monitoring service which allows you to monitor your employee surveillance system when you have a internet connection. Refog Employee Monitor review: While the overall design of Refog Employee Monitor is very simple and designed for both the employers as well as the employees the additional benefits of the software are the fine-grained control features with customizable alerts, a visual dashboard and also their GeoLocation capabilities with monitoring reports for every individual employee location in real-time. Web page provided by the developer of the software.
