Already working with the United States Department of Agriculture, one goal of the move was to "make available the highest quality, disease-free livestock and food products to Europe," according to a White House fact sheet. "I believe we can do business together to build a strong partnership and there's a lot of potential for us to do this," said USDA Acting Deputy Secretary Javier Palomarez at the event. The visit, he said, also will boost a U.S. trade mission being led by Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue to the Eastern European country. "It's a big opportunity for agriculture and I think we're going to get a lot of these things accomplished," he said. Perdue said "potentially more" commitments for buying U.S. pork would be announced on the trip. "We're going to make a lot of decisions over the coming weeks," he said. The move to export pork to the European Union comes as U.S. pork producers face hurdles moving their goods across borders, underscoring the tricky task of selling a premium product that is less expensive in the U.S. marketplace. As a result, the government has provided more than $2 billion in federal price supports to offset falling feed costs. These have helped lower the cost of feeding the pigs to market weight - the point at which the animals are delivered to the slaughterhouse. But they haven't been as effective for exporting pig products, which has had other problems, such as supply challenges. USDA's chief economist said the goal is to get a higher value for the exports, now mostly to Canada. "Pork exports will never be a world-class, globally competitive industry. The industry is not built for that. We want to make it a world-class industry that can compete globally," he said. Pork producers are "more than a little hesitant" to accept government help, especially now as they face tougher competition to sell their product, he said.Funny thing about the weekly Juche updates... the one we put out for the week now consists of a bunch of pics of the 'Gang St 0cc13bf012
