DIAN HANSON'S PUSSY BOOK.pyt to bibliophilebooksThe present invention relates to a method of producing magnetic substances. More particularly, it relates to a method of producing fine powders of magnetic substances having excellent dispersibility, appropriate particle size and particle size distribution, and no water content in the final product. Fine powders of magnetic substances such as magnetite (Fe_3O_4) and $\gamma\text{-Fe}_2\text{O}_3$, have heretofore been produced by grinding a starting material such as an ore or ore concentrate to a particle size of 1 to 20 μm . The grinding, however, is accompanied by a considerable loss of the starting material and by a substantial rise in the production costs, so that it is difficult to obtain sufficiently fine powders at low cost. Further, fine powders obtained by grinding are in the form of aggregates of irregularly shaped particles, so that if they are further subjected to a strong magnetic field, it is difficult to obtain uniformly fine-grained products. The present inventors have found that the above-described drawbacks can be overcome by the following steps: (1) A starting material is fired in an electric furnace, and the resultant mixture is ground in an intermediate mill to obtain a mixed powder containing γ -Fe₂O₃ and magnetite. (2) The mixed powder is fired in an electric furnace to make a transition to iron oxide and ferrite. (3) The resulting iron oxides are pulverized by means of a jet mill, and a magnetite or ferrite powder is obtained.

The above-described method is characterized in that a starting material is fired, and fine powders of iron oxides are High-affinity N-methyl-D-aspartate (NMDA) sites were determined on single hippocampal pyramidal neurons from normal young adult, mature and aged rats. The animals were anaesthetized with urethane, and the amino acids for sodium-dependent high-affinity [3H]-NMDA binding were locally added to the perfusion medium. The distribution of NMDA receptors was found to be age-dependent. They were more abundant in the mature hippocampus, and decreased in the aged hippocampus, when compared with the young adult hippocampus. One of the worlds first iconic road signs was introduced in the 1970s. The E-shape design made the sign recognizable all over the world. Although Japan and North America adopted the E-shape in the 1970s, it is often referred to the United Kingdom as the E-shape. That's because the E-shape design is used to mark major roads on maps and on road signs in the United Kingdom. Before the E-shape, the white road sign was almost an afterthought. In the 1950s, most road signs used a yellow background with a black arrow that was located on the left side of the road sign. The arrow pointed in the direction that the road sign was supposed to be travelling. In the 1970s, the yellow background with a black arrow was changed to a white background with a black E-shape.
