Not too long ago, I was searching for articles on Android and came across a statement on one such site, “You can’t do anything without Android.” I honestly thought this was something somebody had just made up, but when I looked closer, it seems to be a truism for many. For example, you cannot change a home screen without Android. Can’t add a contacts, can’t add a calendar, can’t add a task, cannot do anything with WiFi, can’t look up the weather, can’t do anything else. If you don’t have Android, you get nothing. And this is not overstating the truth. Yes, there are app stores on other OS platforms like iOS and Windows Phone, but you will mostly get nothing. That’s because these services are restricted. You can download apps from these app stores but you can’t install apps without the app store. The app store access is what makes the app store something exclusive and not like an open market. Microsoft has long tried to fight off this paradigm with its own app stores, like in Windows 8. However, it was given a pass for now because MS had seen the future – an ecosystem dominated by the OS. But looking at OS and ecosystem dominance more clearly in 2016, we can see that Microsoft has missed the larger picture. The mobile apps are just one side of the digital life equation. What matters most is not the apps but the services and data that are intertwined with the app ecosystem. And Android has these in abundance. Android looks like a flawed OS, but there’s nothing flawed about it. An OS like Windows does not carry the apps as well as Google does. Before coming to this conclusion, I had to fully understand the structural flaw that Windows suffers from. And this was the only way to do so. This is why Windows needs so much apps. Because apps are not the main draw of an OS. An OS is meant to do things on behalf of the apps and the apps are secondary to the OS. And if you don’t have apps on your OS platform, you won’t do much with it. Have you ever used Windows Phone without apps? Do you use it at all? If not, it’s not a bad OS. It has all the functionalities that are necessary for a mobile

The present invention relates to a method and system for accessing business documents stored on a network. Electronic communication has grown in popularity due to increasing availability and decreasing cost of electronic communication tools. For example, electronic mail systems allow users to send and receive messages, file transfer protocols enable users to transfer files, and Internet browsers allow users to access Internet web pages. These electronic communication tools make it easier for people to communicate with each other. In addition, companies are becoming more and more reliant on the Internet for conducting business. Electronic communication tools, including electronic mail systems, file transfer protocols, and web browsers, are used for a variety of purposes, such as sending messages, sharing information, and accessing the World Wide Web, respectively. For example, users may utilize electronic mail systems to coordinate and plan travel or working trips. In another example, users may utilize file transfer protocols to share media, such as movies and music. In another example, users may utilize Internet browsers to conduct Internet commerce. Unfortunately, these tools may be challenging for some users to use. This is especially true in many Internet and network-based applications, such as Internet browsers and electronic mail systems, which may be complex. Electronic mail systems may be particularly difficult for users to use. For example, electronic mail systems may be difficult to use because of the format used to send messages. Many electronic mail systems use a mail box where each user is associated with a mail box. Sending a message from a mail box requires entering the recipient address in the text box and clicking on a Send button. Thus, a user may have to learn how to operate the mail box and the buttons on a mail box, and may also have to remember to use the mail box when sending messages. The difficulty and complexity of electronic mail systems may be increased for users with disabilities who may have difficulty operating electronic mail systems. For example, users with vision or mobility impairments may have difficulty reading the address of a recipient displayed on an electronic mail system. In another example, users with learning or attention problems may have difficulty remembering all of the addresses for a large group of recipients and remembering to associate a particular address with each recipient. Electronic mail systems, such as Microsoft® Outlook®, may present an additional problem for many users. Many users have difficulty remembering to send a message once they have sent the message. Users may be encouraged to send reminders to send the message to recipients. For example, some electronic mail systems provide a Remind Me button on the recipient list that allows the user to
