"This is the first time I've seen this in Canada," said Bill Murphy, vice president of groundwater remediation for property and casualty at the groundwater engineering firm American Water Works. "We've been to many wells. The issues we're seeing around Canada are not on the scale of the ones in states like New York or New Jersey." The U.S. wells in question were located near drinking water sources, but Canada has responded differently to contamination. Canada has tightened its rules. Earlier this year, the regulators reinterpreted the science and the law. The rule, known as the Cross-State Air Pollution Rule, or CSAPR, was scheduled to take effect on September 1. But the EPA delayed it, citing the ongoing Clean Air Interstate Rule controversy that the agency wants Congress to address this summer. Hazardous air pollutants are toxic chemicals and radioactive elements that can harm humans and wildlife. They include carcinogens, such as those found in tobacco smoke, the gasoline fumes emitted by cars, and emissions from factories and power plants. EPA is required to reduce toxic air emissions under the Clean Air Act. "The air is just cleaner now than it was 30 or 50 years ago, but it's also cleaner because we've gotten cleaner as a nation," says Joseph Goffman, director of air and climate for the Natural Resources Defense Council. This is not true, however. Air quality worsened more or less continuously between 1960 and 2008, according to a report by the American Lung Association. At the same time, emissions of hazardous air pollutants increased. In fact, a 2007 study of some 153 counties found that across the country, the air quality improved by just 0.2 percent since 1990. "Even a little drop in air quality can mean big health problems," says David Cutler, director of the health effects research center at Harvard University. A recent study concluded that even though nationwide air quality has improved since the 1970s, that air is consistently dirtier than it was in the 1990s. EPA agrees that the air has improved in recent decades, in large part because the Clean Air Act reduced toxic
