down load fisika dasar 1 pdf fisika dasar efileThis isn't your father's beer It takes guts and pride to produce a real beer that's different and better than 99 percent of the commercial beer on the planet. That's how Dave Van Orman felt. It also takes a bold heart, to be your own boss and take a chance, even at the risk of letting a lot of other people down. It's not easy, and that's why so few are willing to take the plunge. Like anybody else, the odds are stacked against you, and it's a tough environment in which to make a success of your life. Van Orman is no different. In the late 1980s, he was working for another brewery in Richmond, Va. He came to think of a beer that was a little different. He left his position to start a new brewery and make his product. That was a recipe for disaster, and I once asked him about it. "It was a hit-or-miss thing, my own brewery," Van Orman told me. "You mean people liked it, and some didn't?" I asked. "Some didn't even drink it," he said. People drink beer for a reason. If they don't like your product, they won't drink it. It doesn't matter if it's good, if they don't like it. That wasn't a problem for Van Orman. "That was the best-selling beer at Richmond," he said. "It was good beer, but I had nobody to push it for me, because I was doing it myself." With a bit of nerve, a lot of confidence and a little luck, he made a beer better and different, but at a time when the industry was collapsing, when nobody gave him a chance, when he was one of the least-known brewers in the world, somebody came along and gave him a chance, when nobody wanted anything to do with him. They bought his beer. "I wouldn't say there was anything special about it," Van Orman said, when asked to name a defining characteristic of his beer. "I think it was really a lot of good qualities. You know, the state of the industry at that time, the people that were running the industry -- they had a certain set of character traits they wanted to have, and they wanted good beer.
