A: From the output of the grep command, a pattern of [.mp3] is matched and the captured group 1 is appended to your filename. Further, .+?\. [.mp3] matches any sequence of characters, including a newline, up to the end of the string, and is also captured. Thus, in a combination of those two patterns, everything you want is (.+?\. [.mp3]$) For example, $ echo hi hi.mp3 $ echo hi [.mp3] $ echo hi hi.mp3 $ echo hi [.mp3] $ echo hi hi.mp3 $ echo hi (.+?\. [.mp3]$) $ echo hi hi.mp3 $ echo hi [.mp3] $ echo hi hi.mp3 $ echo hi (.+?\. [.mp3]$) $ echo hi hi.mp3 Q: Possible algorithms for circular shifting of red-black trees? There's this paper by Bader, Berger, and Ney, which is on page 4, showing that there are two different ways of circularly shifting a red-black tree. However, they only show the insertion point for the two algorithms. It doesn't show the algorithm, or even the order of the algorithms. I'd like to know what the general algorithm is for circularly shifting a red-black tree, especially in the same way that a normal node is shifted. A: In order to move a node $x$, one would need to do something like the following (probably not the fastest, but I believe the resulting tree will be left, right, or balanced): Move $x$ to the neighbor $y$ on the right (left if right is the parent of $x$). If $y$ is red, make $y$ black, and make $x$ black. If $y$ is black, make $y$ red, and make $x$ red. If $y$ is black and $x$ is red, make $y$ red and make $x$ black. If the node on the left is red, then the algorithm is as follows (or
