I tried to figure out the solution but I have no idea how to go about it; I have been told that instead of changing the algorithm, I should instead use Python's built-in functions to solve the problem. Create a list containing the sales of each customers in the range 200 to 1000 in base 2. Write a function called BinaryInsertionSort() that uses the built-in function lambda to return a binary insertion sort function. The image shows the original problem given to me: So I have no clue how to implement it. Any help would be really appreciated. Thank you. A: This solution is based on your comment to triplicated's answer and this code was tested with python 3.4 (Able to use the built-in function even when the source list is read_only. Haven't tested it with python 3.5 but I imagine it could work). from collections import Counter def get_sales_amplication_list(sales): sales_ampl = Counter() # growth - enables mulitple alterations to the source list in one step
