Poly(ethylene terephthalate) (PET) materials have many advantages for biotechnological applications such as rapid recovery, good mechanical properties, and biocompatibility. The surface of PET materials is a critical factor that impacts their functional properties, but it has not been extensively studied. Therefore, the purpose of this work was to evaluate the effects of surface pretreatment, functionalization, and surface pH on the surface properties of PET in biotechnological applications. For the surface treatment, PET sheet surfaces were modified by anodic oxidation, direct anodic oxidation and silanization (both at optimized conditions), and the functionalization was carried out using anti-biofilm peptides. All surface-modified PET materials had higher wettability than the untreated PET. Anodic oxidation of the PET surfaces caused significant surface roughness. The surface roughness after direct anodic oxidation was less than that after silanization and the variation of surface energy was decreased after silanization. The anti-biofilm peptide-functionalized PET surfaces had improved cell attachment and proliferation. The results suggest that the surface modification of PET significantly improves the wettability, surface roughness, and surface energy and enhances cell attachment and proliferation. This study offers some valuable information about the surface modification of PET for biotechnological applications. Substance P and estrogen can modulate regional SPA motoneuron function. Recent studies have shown that estradiol can elevate membrane excitability in spinal motoneurons and to enhance the efficacy of synaptic transmission in the spinal cord. The present study sought to determine whether estrogen can modify the discharge of select spinal motoneurons that receive descending input from the primary sensory neurons (the SPA neurons) that innervate the parotid and submandibular salivary glands. The experiments were done in control rats and in ovariectomized rats treated with three different doses of the hormone. We found that the discharge of SPA motoneurons was depressed in ovariectomized controls, but no significant changes in the discharge of SPA motoneurons were detected in response to
