A lot of good things come down to people being in a certain time frame, and not in that time frame means the wait time (to get an illicit product) can be horribly delayed. ------ dahart > But the pharmacies run afoul of a bigger criminal justice trend: The > American war on drugs, which has resulted in more than 1 million Americans > getting arrested every year for simple possession. This sort of thing is a real problem. I'm not trying to suggest that people shouldn't be arrested and charged for drug offenses, I just hope they don't get charged with more serious ones and get targeted by something like mandatory minimum sentencing. I'm not naive, I know it's not possible for people to not do drugs. But I think the war on drugs has played a big role in making just those people more likely to be charged with more serious offenses than they need to be, and perhaps being at risk of mandatory minimum sentencing. If this is what it takes to get the Naloxone on the market sooner, then that's what it takes. I don't see that anyone can lose anything but time if the new pharmacy model succeeds, unless of course the industry was already going to fail. ~~~ scurvy How many people are getting killed by prescription
