It was a beautiful afternoon when we went to record. By the way, we talked about the new album on the way home from the studio. We started on a little trip down memory lane, by talking about our history together. We talked about everything that had happened from our first studio experience to the present. We both agreed that the farm was the birthplace of Koto Electric. It was the perfect environment for us to make music. Brian reminded me of the time when we were living there and I informed him that the ceiling was constantly vibrating. He said that he could actually feel it. I have never heard of it being a problem in any of our studio experiences. It was my first time with him that I'd actually heard the vibration, but he was right. The hardwood floor did seem to vibrate. It was unusual for us to really notice some things like that. But this was the beginning of something special. It was about this time that I asked him what his favorite Koto sounds like. Then I asked him the same question. The two of us had an immediate response. We both said the same thing, "The old house". Then we began to talk about it. This started us on our journey back to that wonderful little home. This was the beginning of working together, being aware that we each had a favorite piece of equipment and it was our job to make the best use of it. We decided that we'd bring our two favorite pieces of equipment, the MCI 4140 and Pro76, into that little home and get to work on the new album. We told each other that we'd only have about three hours to complete the mixing/tracking to the deadline that we set for ourselves. We had our two computers, a couple of EQ's and a few compressors, a few equalizers and a compressor/limiter. The Pro76 was on the main stage with the Proclar 75-20 as the main compressor. We turned the Pro76 off, turned the Proclar up full blast, and went to work. I was playing around with different settings when Brian interrupted me and told me that the "old house" had begun to vibrate. I looked at the meter on the Pro76 and noticed that the levels were all flat. I started the manual meter and noticed that the meter was off the scale. The meter was reading from 12 o'clock to 6 o'clock and it was flat. I thought that there was a problem with the Pro76. I switched

Q: What to use instead of magic_quotes_gpc? I am using a PHP page with a large amount of code from a legacy project. The legacy project was built around the idea of automatic escaping, there is no SQL injection and the code is unable to be easily changed. My plan is to use the HTML Purifier to process the page, ideally with the occasional use of strip_tags() to make sure HTML is validated and non-HTML is removed. I am trying to work out how I will go about sanitising the legacy PHP code. I have tried using esc_html_e() but this has escaped every character to a straight backslash. I have also tried using addslashes() but this strips all the slashes out. Right now I am simply using: addslashes() on every text field - but I feel like this isn't the best way to go about it. What library or function should I be using to sanitise my code. A: There are tons of "Security by Obscurity" solutions that would make your project more difficult. I suggest you to go for a safe solution. Here's the list of best technologies to secure your application, according to me: Database connection security use PDO with the SQL prepared statements and the auto-commit prepared statement (also known as a parameterized statement) and the BindValue parameter (only if you use the PDO parameterized approach) Use the PDO::quote method to escape the values provided into the SQL statements. This method also escapes the values you pass into the parameter. Don't use the mysql_real_escape_string method to escape the values provided into the SQL statements. This method does not escape the values provided into the parameters. Instead, use PDO::quote for escaping values to be provided into the parameters and bindValue for escaping values to be provided into the SQL statement. Database locking Prevent other threads from accessing your application while you're modifying your data with one of the following approaches: The SQL statement should run in a transaction and a statement lock (in addition to row locks) should be placed on each table, column, and index. Use foreign key constraints to lock tables based on parent/child relationships. Use an idempotent locking technique
