The crystal structure of Escherichia coli DNA gyrase has been refined at 2.3 A resolution. DNA gyrase is a 591 amino acid protein, and the structure of its B subunit, GyrB, revealed striking similarity with the catalytic subunit of topoisomerase IV, ParC. DNA gyrase is a homodimer of two GyrB subunits linked by an anti-parallel four-helix bundle of which the C-terminal helix is turned over the dimer interface. DNA gyrase relaxes positive supercoils in DNA with the aid of an ATP-dependent DNA cleavage/ligation reaction. Catalytic residues are identified at GyrB positions of 195, 509, 513, 519 and 521. Comparison with the ParC structure and DNA cleavage/ligation experiments show that efficient catalysis depends on the presence of Arg 195, which forms a hydrogen bond to a phosphorous atom at the bottom of the scissile DNA. A distinct DNA-binding site at the C-terminal end of the four-helix bundle is proposed to interact with negatively charged DNA and to orient the cleavage/ligation reaction.In Home Infrared Camera that recognizes the living status through Low Power Consumption The first-generation camera system of 6 types of motion detection camera can also be used with the plug of the National ICT Promotion Agency, FAWRI.
