£390 million, I've worked for them since the late 1980s. I've always been impressed by the quality of their maps ('no imagination, but a lot of hard work' – a UK government minister, as quoted in Rolling Stone magazine), and the speed and accuracy of the metadata behind their products. I've always known what a big deal it was to be a customer of theirs: not only did you have to be able to buy accurate, easy-to-read maps, and know that you could trust them, but you also had to have a very exact place on the map grid, otherwise they couldn't show you anything beyond the most obvious places. But as the digital era dawns, I'm seeing a new risk to this quality assurance that has never existed before in the mapping business. Ordnance Survey are no longer just a supplier of maps, but are also very capable users of and developers of new geospatial data. For many years, the key to local government and business, or indeed anyone else, who wished to know something about the place where they live or work, would be walking around their neighbourhood, asking those people on the street, or other service providers: 'Have you seen anyone operating in this area without the company name on their door?’ If you heard one, you knew you were talking about a company. That’s no longer a problem. With the Digital Britain report the government published last year, the definition of local government changed.

Where local services used to be run by local councils, and where local businesses were not just those companies with the local names on their doors, but companies with any geographic location, then those businesses were no longer local. Where once it was only services such as libraries that could be run by a local council, it’s now anyone who offers services to customers in a particular area. And if they are run by a local authority, that’s good enough for government. So where the town or village once knew its council, the town or village now knows someone. If you ask these people what a particular service is, they may know the individual provider who gives them that service, but they may not
