Q: Is there any security/coding risk in writing too much code in Java? I've been programming on Java for about a year now, and I'm finding myself writing a lot of repetitive code. For example, I wrote a "get/set" converter that takes a file name and creates a set of objects representing properties of that file name. There are a few different kinds of files, so I have to write different classes for them, and often I do find myself writing the exact same method and just changing one line here and there. I tend to find myself missing this type of method so often, so I've created an abstract class for all the properties to share one method. This has mostly stopped me from creating these exact same classes over and over, but I'd like to write the common code first in one place and then copy it to the others. Is there any security or coding risk in writing too much code in Java? I've heard good things and bad things about over-programming, and I'm not sure what the real dangers are. I would like to take some precautions before writing one of these utilities class/methods so that I don't make a common hacker mistake. A: Writing code is one of the primary ways that (statically typed) programming prevents security-related issues. Using the same function over and over again is an anti-pattern that often creates security holes. In general, it's better to have multiple solutions to a problem than to have a monolithic solution. This is a case where a monolithic solution makes sense. A: I don't see the problem. Create a base class, implement different subclasses to get/set a specific property and then create a generic interface that provides a method to get/set them all.

public interface IPropertyContainer { public Object getProp1(); public String getProp2(); ... } public abstract class BasePropertyContainer implements IPropertyContainer { ... @Override public Object getProp1() { 1cdb36666d
