Health disparities have been shown to be associated with a complex of social, economic, and environmental risk and protective factors. Determining how individual and family-level risk and protective factors influence health and health disparities is thus the focus of a major research effort by public health agencies. Recent methodological advances now allow for more detailed and nuanced identification of risk factors and a description of relationships among them. This new methodological approach relies on using what has come to be called "evidence-based approaches." These methods allow for detailed study designs of multilevel risk factors and their effects on health and health disparities. Developing these methodological tools requires a multidisciplinary research approach in which there is an emphasis on collaboration of social and behavioral scientists with health researchers and policy makers. Key theoretical concepts and principles in the approach are introduced and illustrated with examples from diverse settings and health outcomes.// Copyright 2019, Intel Corporation // // Licensed under the Apache License, Version 2.0 (the "License"); // you may not use this file except in compliance with the License. // You may obtain a copy of the License at // //
