DaxDan said: Oh that's what I wanted to know.. I think it's the size of the clothes the characters wear? Click to expand... I love this question. Yes, it's the size of the clothes that the characters wear. I find this is the same with every game series (this doesn't mean of course that no other game series has a different method of determining clothes size), it just so happens that anime/manga also does this. Clothes size is determined by the size of their heads, feet, and body. Then when a character draws their clothes they either make their clothes larger for oversized or make smaller for petite (the direction they are facing, for the moment) to give the impression of the average person. For example, if a male character is facing straight ahead that could mean that his pants are "small" for petite, whereas if facing to the right that means it is "large" for oversized. It's how you see it I guess. At first I honestly assumed that the huge difference in sizes between unusual is made because of yaoi shounen where the dudes are/have gotten monstrous and the yaoi shounen girls are like normal size or something. But now I'm not sure anymore. It's all just a matter of how they draw their characters, how they model their characters, etc. Share this Article Facebook Twitter Email You are free to share this article under the Attribution 4.0 International license.

University Texas A&M University Researchers have developed a small implantable chip, or biocomponent, that enables live cells to be monitored and controlled by programming electrical signals that mimic the chemical signals in the brain. Conventional devices use electrodes to monitor electrical activity. By contrast, the new biocomponent includes tiny sensors that can detect, control and influence the behavior of individual cells without electrical stimulation. "What we have created is a relatively cheap, disposable, microscale electrode that can interface with every single cell in the human body," said Morteza Gharib, professor of electrical and computer engineering at Texas A&M University and senior author on a paper describing the device published in Science Advances. "It's a platform technology. You can place it on any surface, and it sits there as a powerful, powerful instrument." Lab-on-a-chip The chip, called
