In a recent work, Wei and co-workers addressed this issue by focusing on a superconducting nanowire-superconductor-nanowire junction with two superconducting leads to study the nonlinear Josephson effect near the quantum critical point [Zhu]. They found that the TPA effect tends to suppress the magnitude of the critical Josephson current. While in the present work we have focused on the TPA effect on a conventional semiconductor S-D-S junction, which is the key part of ultra-low-power integrated circuits, our results provide a useful insight into the BEC-BCS crossover, and also the Josephson current in particular, in nanowire-superconductor-nanowire junctions. We also studied the current noise power spectrum. In the BEC phase the Coulomb interaction causes the particle-hole excitation and fluctuations of Cooper pairs into quasiparticle excitations, which leads to the appearance of subgap Andreev bound states in the quasiparticle energy spectrum. Consequently, the particle-hole excitation spectrum exhibits two Andreev levels at $E = \pm \Delta_s$. Correspondingly, in the noise spectra two dips appear at $E = \pm \Delta_s$. In contrast, in the BCS side the Coulomb interaction is sufficiently weak and the excitation spectrum shows only the quasiparticle levels. Consequently, in the noise spectrum the dips appear only at the quasiparticle levels, 6d1f23a050
