Noninvasive method for establishing an oxidant-antioxidant balance. A noninvasive method for measuring oxygen consumption and oxygen levels in living tissue was evaluated in dogs as a means of establishing an oxidant-antioxidant balance. Oxygen consumption was calculated by measuring the change in the O<sub>2</sub> content of the O<sub>2</sub> carrier hemoglobin in the arterial blood with the N<sub>2</sub>c-O<sub>2</sub> technique. Oxidant and antioxidant levels were quantitated by light scattering. Before and after administration of glucose to dogs, the dose-response relationship between the amount of glucose given and the increase in glucose consumption was determined and calculated. This showed that at 50 mg/kg, the dose of glucose given to dogs causes a significant ( $p$  less than 0.05) increase in glucose consumption without elevating blood sugar levels. This served as the basis for determining the amount of glucose required to overcome the resistance to glucose transfer in dogs. Once a dose of glucose was determined that could overcome the resistance to glucose transfer in dogs, subsequent measurements were made in the dogs to determine whether this dose of glucose increased consumption and reduced free radical release, as measured by light scattering. These measurements showed that the oxidant-antioxidant balance was altered significantly. With these new features, Huawei's app store now supports some Chinese-language games. Huawei's app store, which is usually the only app store available on its smartphones, has added a handful of brand new features. The most obvious addition is that users can now add Chinese-language games to their downloads list, and games can be sorted by download count, release date, price, or rating. Huawei says it's seen a "noticeable increase" in the number of downloads for its two-dozen Chinese-language games on the app store. Another handy addition is in-app icon for each game, so users don't have to search all over the store for a specific app. There are still no 6d1f23a050
