There are also many commercially available test strips for food, beverage, and pharmaceutical analysis. For example, there is VELPODEX (ACE), GENTRA-DEX (Hoffman La-Roche), GALEN (Abbott), BIO-DEX (Bayer), and PLEX-DEX (Sekisui-Dentech) (All references are hereby incorporated by reference). All of the above-mentioned analytical test strips and methods have in common that they are limited in their ability to detect a broad range of biomarkers, such as tumor markers. For example, the prior art methods have required large sample sizes and very long reaction times, and/or have limited their operation to whole blood samples. Generally, the prior art methods rely on enzyme-substrate interactions to produce measurable results and may also use dipsticks for determination of total analyte concentration in blood. There are several disadvantages of these prior art methods including, but not limited to, the following: (1) lengthy incubation times are necessary, which is often two to four hours or more; (2) false positives are common, since the reagents are usually polyspecific and not even specific to the analyte being tested; (3) large sample sizes are required (1-5 microliters of whole blood) to achieve accurate results, and small sample sizes are often not available (for example, individuals taking blood from a finger prick with a lancet); and (4) the testing must be done away from laboratory conditions. This usually requires the testing to be performed at a physician's office or at a point-of-care testing site. For example, U.S. Pat. No. 5,053,338 discloses a method for detecting tumor markers in whole blood. This
