Perceived and objective social support in successful weight reduction. This study explored whether people who had successfully reduced their body weight ($n = 149$) differed from those who were not successful in recruiting social support from friends, family, and others in the community for their weight reduction efforts. Interviews and self-administered questionnaires were used to collect the relevant data. The results indicated that the former group had better relationships with friends and family for their weight loss than the latter group. The latter group also relied on the community for more social support than the former group did, both before and after their weight loss attempts. Implications for the use of these findings are discussed.

Share this: I recently learned of a super cool new website that I would like to share with you: Bike Leaders, sponsored by the National Park Service. It is the brainchild of John Toman, who at the ripe old age of 25, recently left his job in the film industry and, with a background in architecture, decided to do what he is passionate about: biking. Toman has created a community of cyclists which has the goal of advocating for better bicycle infrastructure. To get the word out, he sent his phone number to just about every bike blog and online media outlet he could find. (He also wrote a blog post on his experience trying to educate the public.) The result is a series of community forums, which have been posted online. Now, the public can comment on all aspects of bike commuting, including areas for improvement. The NPS is the first to ask for input on the routes they design. To be honest, I was initially wary of the idea of Bike Leaders. Part of it has to do with how I perceive people who are trying to sell me on their products/services and/or is how I perceive certain business bloggers. But I immediately felt like this was different. This is new. And, I am personally impressed. The bike community is literally right 6d1f23a050
