Sometimes, they get free to play games because the developers are willing to work for free, like with Mattel's Ty the Tasmanian Tiger, who was originally going to be called Batman on a Go-Kart. I believe this is the first time a game has been made for free because the developer wanted to make a game, not because they wanted to make money or do something with their reputation, like an indie game that's much less likely to get funded on Kickstarter.

However, that doesn't mean the games we have are the best games we could have made if we were millionaires. Gamasutra article Therefore, the free games make us look at the games we have like we're dorks, but we've made the best game we could make, and if we'd like to make a game better, we can make a game better. I think this is a way to get the creative juices flowing by making something that's not as well done as you'd like, and then using that to improve something else, and I like that. It does also help that most of the games are free. Some people would spend a couple hours making a demo of something that's going to take them several hours to make, and then if they were given a million dollars, it would probably get finished in that time. I don't think that would end up being a good game, but it would be interesting. I think free is good for learning. Don't sweat it I want to stress this: it's OK if the game you worked on doesn't look good. It's always bad when people get excited over something that's bad. It's also bad if you worry about it being bad. There are two kinds of people: those who make games, and those who judge games. If you make games, I think you should worry about making the best game you could make. It's all about learning, and not being afraid to go back to the drawing board. That's why I think this is good. If you're a judge, you should worry about whether a game is good or bad, and not be concerned with whether it's made by a friend or by a celebrity. When there's a lot of hype, c6a93da74d
